Well, I'll certainly defer to your friend, Tim...

That's one I had not heard, but it certainly makes sense. The other reasons I cited were all told to me by a retired WI-DNR supervisor I met on the creek up there. But based on what you've said, these other things could be additional or side benefits and perhaps that was what he was saying.

On a side issue, I hope they don't go too crazy with this brook trout restoration thing, at least in the SW limestones. In terms of potential for growth and for the agricultural conflicts so many of the streams have, they are in practical terms, IMO at least, markedly inferior to the resident browns as the best candidate to provide the backbone of the fishery.
