Yea no doubt. I'm sittin here smiling because I was wearing those "can't catch a trout to save my life" shoes just a short time ago. And yes, even when you kind of know what you are doing, you will still have days when you can't get a strike. But they are less frequent after you learn the basics.

Match the hatch is the main point to this FF'n game. Trout are Soooo picky, just a slight color difference even if it's the right fly, will turn them away. That is what kept me out of this sport for the longest time. Now I'm up to the challenge. There is still so much for me to learn. But I have the BWO and Sulphur class credits.

I've been going to TroutNut.com. That's a great place to learn about bugs. That guy takes some amazing pictures. And of course I have my friend Joe who has taught me so much, and these people on here. So don't be afraid to ask questions, on here or the stream. If they are a good person they will offer you some advice. Some times you just need to stop and watch to see if you can tell what flies the fish are rising for and keep tying until you find something close enuff for them to take. I'm still a little cloudy on the nymphing thing. You just need to know what bugs are around and whay they look like. I prefer to just keep throwing dries, but I'm sure that will change in time.

So good luck to all us new people. 🍷 🍷
