JayL gives good advice.

Good stalking and wading skills are extremely important. With these skills you can really get much closer to the fish than you think because you can blend into the environment and although the trout may see you, if you move slowly they do not view you as a threat. You simply need to plan everything – you can't wing it or something will go wrong. Spot the fish or the location you think the fish are holding, figure out where you want to present your fly from (sometimes the ideal spot isn't the best spot because you physically can't get there or can't cast from the ideal spot), figure out how you're going to get there quietly and then give it your best shot. You're better off missing short or to the side than long and over.
