I believe that the most important thing is the first cast in many situations. most of the time it is then that u will catch one of these jewels. Also another thing that is extremely important is stealth in the approach. like many others have said is stay out of the water as much as possible but there are times that the mountain laurel is so close together that this is impossible.

The delicate trout that come from these waters have captivated me and from the first time that i ever saw a wild trout when i was 11 it has been very difficult for me to fish for stocked trout. They have inspired me which is actively seen in my art work and writing. Practice makes as close as humans can get to perfection. Never ever give up.

us wild trout anglers are a secretive bunch but it is us that need to raise the awareness to save these beautiful fish, even if it means giving up a fishing spot.

100% agree!! I went to Pocono this week, and I fished in a local small creek which is part of the personal propert. People live there are very nice and let me to fish in their creek. So lucky, I caught a very small wild brown trout. It is SO beautiful, the body is so smooth and soft, and color is so pretty. there is no comparison those stock trouts. I unhooked it and put it back very very carefully, and so grateful to have this specie in this world.
